WHEN LLOYD Makes a Promise He Fulfills It to the Letter!

The people of Chicago know this, so whenever he advertises any great specialties (which he does frequently if not oftener)

CROWDS FLOCK to HIS STORE.

Last Sunday he announced in these columns that on Monday last he would inaugurate

THE MOST MARVELOUS Clearing-Out Sale EVER KNOWN

In the annals of the Chicago Dry-Goods business. The consequence was that on Monday his store was crowded to such excess that the doors had to be closed and admission suspended five times during the day. That talks louder than words.

He now announces a continuation of the sale in all its primitive vigor. Tomorrow morning at half-past nine

Mark-Down Most Marvelous Bargains that Baffle Belief!

As hundreds of Ladies were too late to secure one of the beautiful Souvenirs, we have telegraphed for and received three thousand more, so each and every one of the three thousand Ladies first to enter Lloyd's Store after half-past 9 Tomorrow Morning will be presented with a handsome Souvenir commemorative of this gala event.

THIS SOUVENIR IS A True Gem of High Art,

Being a charming lithograph in seventeen different colors, representing

The Dove of Peace Descending!

And is conceded by all connoisseurs to be the most exquisite achievement of Lithographic Art in America.

A copy given free, gratis, for nothing, to each of the three thousand Ladies first to enter

THE SHORT SUNDAY STORY

Continuation of Mr. Henry James' Fascinating Tale, "Georgina's Reasons."

Mrs. Partlet Proves Herself No Match for the Self-Willed Girl—A Great Event.

The Public Gazette Reports Another Successful Exit and "Some Away in Its Gig."

Second Part.

CHAPTER III.

It will doubtless seem to the reader very singular that, in spite of this collection, which appeared to give me the judgment of the man, Mrs. Partlet should, in the course of a long talk that I have summarized in everything that Georgina asked of her. I have thought it best to recount at length the first conversation that took place between them, but I shall not know further the details of the great surprise, or the shock by which she had succeeded in making her, simple, shallow, amiable, well-meaning little creature, who would not speak of a lowered voice, who would not speak of it, without getting red with anger. It was the simple fact of Georgina's great condition that moved her; this young lady's greatest disgrace was the announcement of her predicament. She might be bad, she had a splendid spirit, temper, but she had way of attaching to whom or whatever incidentally, accidentally, and inconsistently she had attached herself, a quality of tenderness, that Mrs. Partlet had discovered, and whose Georgina had shown that she couldn't go home, that she refused to be with her and with her mother, that she couldn't remain herself—she couldn't—rather than she should see her mother. Mrs. Partlet had known her from her cradle, and when Georgina had shown that she couldn't go home, that she refused to be with her and with her mother, that she couldn't remain herself—she couldn't—rather than she should see her mother, Mrs. Partlet had felt that she was dealing with her and her mother, and that she was dealing with a reality. This was consequence, she was capable, she was, in a certain sense, fastidious. She had a certain regard for her, and some of her ideas in regard to her, and sentiments, and sometimes she was plain, rather ugly, but to make her young friend in Europe was to help her, and to leave her alone was to help her. Georgina frankly explained that her mother was a fool, and that she was a fool, and that she was a fool, and that she
